THE Willows

Historic Palm Springs Inn

written by Elyse Glickman

AN OLD-HOLLYWOOD HIDEAWAY
REVIVED AND REIMAGINED

Palm Springs has been Hollywood's backyard retreat as long as there has been a Hollywood. With that insight, Los Angeles Architect William J. Dodd built twin estates—The Willows and The Bishop House—in 1925 for two very private and wealthy L.A. couples. This elegantly landscaped and constructed paradise is discreetly tucked away behind impressive iron gates just two blocks from Palm Springs' downtown. Over time, various industry luminaries (such as Marion Davies, introduced to a new generation of cinephiles in the David Fincher film Mank) took up residence or stayed as guests (Paul Thomas Anderson penned his Academy Award-winning screenplay, There Will Be Blood, in the patio of The Library Room suite).

BELOW: The detailed, historic dining room.

This architecturally unique lodging retains that "Old Hollywood" exclusivity even with amenities and special touches embraced by today's choosy travelers (including a chef-driven breakfast, evening wine and hors d'oeuvres, poolside snacks, complimentary parking with a commitment to health and safety for all guests). Each of the 17 rooms between the two houses feature a queen or king-size beds, plush linens and hand-selected furniture reminiscent of the era coupled with modern necessities such as high-speed Internet, individual climate control, flat screen television, and in-room refrigerator plus plush robes for lounging. The 17 rooms also that ensure only 34 or fewer guests are on property. Among the eight rooms of The Willows, three have their own outside entrances overlooking the swimming pool. The remaining five rooms and suites have French doors leading to private patios and balconies or views of the mountains and 50-foot waterfall that cascades down a sheer rock formation. The Bishop House, connected to The Willows by a meandering terraced pathway or on the ground level via
